OVER 20,000 MORE DEMOCRATIC VOTES THAN GOP

and Jackson counties and St. Louis city concentrated on either one and the difference between 3,500 and 12,258 the vote Atkinson actually received in Jackson county, or 8,758 added to the opposition total, Missouri's next governor with his big state total, including his St. Joseph and St. Louis vote, would still have been nominated by 250. Had Farris withdrawn from the race, at least half of his rural vote would have gone to Atkinson and only the balance to Mayer. The final result would have been the same.

Stone's Phenomenal Race

What's in a name is illustrated by the phenomenal race that John H. Stone of Bates county made for the democratic nomination for state treasurer, he receiving 86,084 and thereby defeating by 39,548 the "doughboy" candidate, Vincent Heisecker, of Benton, Scott county, who ran second. As it was the demobilized volunteer soldier, young Heisecker, entirely unknown to democratic politics whose campaign covered less than two weeks and whose big asset was that he was a "genuine doughboy" pulled down 46,529 votes, a number sufficient to reflect great credit on the game fight he made. He is still young and the cheerful optimistic manner in which he took the outcome of the contest has caused his friends in Southeast Missouri to freely predict that he is a huge future asset to the democratic party. The returns from twenty counties were, the day after the primary, enough to reveal to this youthful Benton banker the victory had gone to Stone, Bates county's treasurer, and he lost no time in writing that fortunate candidate his congratulations and heartily pledged his strong active support for the November election.

The Magic Name of Stone

The magic name of Stone was the sesame which paved the way to the democratic nomination for state treasurer and brought the nominee the votes of thousands of electors who did not personally know the three candidates and who had never heard of the Scott county "doughboy." It was whispered around in some counties that Stone was a nephew of the late well known and popular United States Senator, William J. Stone, and the enchantment of the name worked silently day and night.

This democratic nominee is a sterling democrat who established a record for efficiency and ability through being the treasurer of Bates county. His candidacy will strengthen the democratic ticket in Cass, Henry Johnson, St. Clair and Vernon counties, in which he is almost as well known and as popular as he is in Bates county.
